

Nebula 2.3, September 2005.

It is always a pleasure to put out a new issue of Nebula, perhaps because the journal format makes each issue unpredictable, exciting, different. In this issue for example, there was veritabily an incursion of poetry and creative writing, the likes of which we have not seen in any other issue of Nebula. In this issue, Nebula publishes its first interview as well as its first ficto-critical piece, but I am still waiting for our first cartoon! The September issue also coincides with the launch of our experimental publishing house - Nebula Press, as we venture from electronic publishing to the more traditional form of book publishing. But let us not digress from the journal content which awaits us ahead: the contributions are sometimes mystifying, sometimes entertaining, sometimes revealing or informative and at others haunting. Once again, I have to say that I do hope you enjoy this issue as much as I have. Samar Habib, Editor
